

CAN I AFFORD A SENIOR LIVING COMMUNITY?

Comparing the value of a retirement community to living at home

Many people assume that aging in place at home will be the most cost-effective option for their retirement years. However, when they begin to look at the details and compare the value of living in a retirement community to the costs associated with remaining in their home, they often are surprised to learn that many retirement communities are more affordable than they originally thought. You may wonder how this is possible. Let's take a look.

Mortgage-free doesn't mean free.

As all homeowners know, the cost of owning a home isn't limited to making a mortgage payment. Even if your house is paid off, there are substantial ongoing costs that remain as long as you own it, including taxes and insurance, maintenance and upkeep, homeowners association dues and more. In addition, appliances and systems like plumbing and HVAC have a way of breaking down at the most inopportune times, often leaving homeowners with hefty bills for repairs or replacement. Add in things like replacing the roof, the water heater or flooring, and the costs can really add up.

Aging in place will also mean new expenses.

While you may be able to take care of things like housekeeping, window washing, lawn care and landscaping on your own now, most people end up needing to hire outside help as they get older. You also may need to make modifications to your home so you'll be able to live there safely. Adding things like grab bars or installing a lift or ramp are common, as are widening doorways to accommodate a wheelchair, changing out doorknobs for handles or even remodeling a bathroom. Also consider any smart-home or health alert technologies you may want to use. In addition to installation, you'll likely pay monthly fees for monitoring of these systems.

Consider the cost of future health care needs.

If you plan to contract for in-home care, research local service providers and find out about typical charges for in-home care. Genworth Financial's current Cost of Care Survey can provide useful information and projections for the future cost of care in many areas of the country.

In short, it's a good idea to add up all the costs associated with owning and continuing to live in your home, so you can understand and accurately compare it to the cost of living in a retirement community.

Calculating the cost of a senior living community.

Senior living communities generally charge a monthly fee that includes your residence and an array of services and amenities. Rental communities — compared to Life Plan or Continuing Care Retirement Communities (CCRCs) — typically don't require a large entrance fee or long-term contract.

For rental independent living, month-to-month charges are typically determined by the floor plan size and location. If a rental community has additional on-site health services such as assisted living, rehabilitation or memory care, residents can engage those levels of care for an additional fee. This offers both convenience and predictability as a resident won't have to look far and wide for a new community if needs change, and they'll have an upfront understanding of all the associated costs.

One monthly fee replaces many individual bills — and all the hassles.

When you live at a senior living community, your monthly fee covers a wide variety of things. First, it covers your residence and all maintenance. You won't have to pay real estate taxes or carry homeowners insurance, and you'll never be stuck with expensive bills to repair or replace any appliance or system. Your monthly fee will also cover lawn care, landscaping and snow removal, and typically covers all utilities and many additional services like housekeeping and 24/7 security.

Never cook again — unless you want to.

When you move to a senior living community, your independent living residence will include a full kitchen, so you're always free to cook for yourself when you want to. However, many people enjoy having someone else take care of the shopping, food preparation and clean-up. Most senior living communities offer a dining plan that can cover every meal or, if you prefer, one or two meals per day. You'll usually find chef-prepared culinary options that range from grab-and-go cafés and casual dining with table service to fine dining restaurants. Changing menus that incorporate the freshest locally sourced ingredients are popular, as are pubs. Many communities also have periodic theme meals and special events, wine-pairing events, cookouts and more.

Compare for yourself.

There are many factors that go into choosing where you'll live and, for many people, cost is a significant consideration. We've created a free, downloadable worksheet to help you calculate the costs of aging in place at home and compare that to the costs and value of a senior living community.
